Gender Mainstreaming in Indonesia's Bilateral
International Development Cooperation

Aswin Ariyanto Azis* and Alifia Nur Azarine

ABSTRACT

Gender mainstreaming is an important subject to be mindful of in the Indonesian government's development cooperation with bilateral development partners. Gender conflict is one of the obstacles that countries face when executing national and international development programs. Indonesia is one of the countries that uses a gender mainstreaming technique in its development programs and development initiatives.

The establishment of a gender mainstreaming strategy (PGU) is vital in developing policies, particularly in carrying out bilateral development cooperation. This is significant for Indonesia as it needs to determine its position in the international arena.

Indonesia's implementation of PGU is faced with many challenges and impediments to fulfilling national interests. One of the strategies undertaken by Indonesia to integrate gender mainstreaming into international development is through the Indonesia-Afghanistan Cooperation Forum to form a strategic partnership with Afghanistan. Indonesia and Afghanistan are seen as a potential bilateral partner with aligned interests in promoting women's empowerment and gender equality. Given that it is not only Indonesia that has national interests, the third-party countries must also interests and positions that are aligned with the agreed-upon and might be detrimental to Indonesia. Therefore, the dynamics of bilateral cooperation between Indonesia and Afghanistan are interesting to observe, considering that GIZ, as a German representative, is present as a mediating bridge between the two countries.

This study aims to explain the strategy for gender mainstreaming in Indonesia's international development cooperation with bilateral partners, which is also equipped with an analysis of the constraints that affect the outcome of the cooperation.

Keywords: Bilateral partners, gender mainstreaming, international development cooperation, South Triangular Cooperation.

INTRODUCTION

Simply speaking, each nation takes an active role in development in order to improve its people's welfare as well as their quality of life throughout many different kinds of areas such as infrastructures, economic growth, education, health, and socio-culture. The UN defines development as a multifaceted effort that seeks to enhance the quality of life for every individual, grounded in sustainable economic, social, and environmental strategies (United Nations, n.d.). However, the state's implementation of the development agenda sometimes faces its own obstacles and challenges, making the state unable to successfully accomplish its desired development goals. Therefore, bilateral development cooperation with other nations is a particular practice to make it easier for countries to attain development. Bilateral partners should be able to benefit from both countries to fulfill their respective country's goals and to strengthen the relationship between them.

Gender was one of the aspects that eventually became the focus of the issue in the bilateral development cooperation process. Gender issues have been called crucial since they will affect how development projects are implemented in perpetuity. Furthermore, gender-related problems have an intimate connection with occurrences that take place at the human level as the target beneficiaries of the development projects (Taufiq & Lintyan, 2017). Gender equality thus represents an essential element that causes the social and institutional reforms that are necessary for accomplishing sustainable
